Everyone can be an ally. No matter what groups we may belong to or have been born into, we each have certain benefits in this society that make it harder (if not impossible) for groups without those benefits to get equal access and justice.

For example: An able-bodied person can be an ally to a people with disabilities; a man can be an ally to women, a white woman can be an ally to people of color; a straight person can be an ally to LGBTQIA people; an economically privileged person can be an ally to low-income communities; and a cisgender person can be an ally to transgender people. And so on and so on.

Allyship is not about playing misery poker about who has had it worse than who or creating divisions among groups. It is about fundamentally understanding and recognizing how we move through this world and how we can help dismantle inequalities alongside those who face unjust systems that may prevent them from having safety and opportunities you may have.
